I now intend to touch upon a hypothesis that serves to individuate some of the extratextual elements understood as cultural levels of "extremely long duration" that are supposed present in the two moments of every text: that of production and that of reception or consumption. Therefore, it does not follow that because good works do not help, bad works will; just as it does not follow that because the sun cannot help a blind man to see, the night and darkness must help him to see.
